

A kudu hunt in the Erongo Mountains: an African hunting story...for when you cant be there (African Hunting Stories Book 7)

At first you'll see a far-off fire, a tiny flicker in the darkness and you'll know men sit there, dressed against the desert cold and planning tomorrow. Should you walk the gravel plain and hail their camp, you'll find the kind of men who follow summer storms to places without a name. Its early dawn and the pale yellow horizon is slowly shaping the granite massif and its summits of blackened rock. Whatever the men are doing as they prepare to leave, they keep glancing towards the mountain, wondering if this is the place they seek. The search began in the 1800s, near Otjimbingwe, shortly after a trader arrived from the desert, seeking water. Next day he was gone, leaving a set of kudu horns and a message of thanks to the small community. The horns became a legend as did the antelope that bore them and those who sought the legend, began with the directions the trader had left you must walk the gravel plains to the west until the summer storms point you to the great mountains and there you'll find a land too beautiful to paint. If your heart is right you'll also know of passion and endless quests and understand the men far out on the gravel plain, and when they speak, it is of a legend, the Grey Ghost of Africa.
