Excerpt: ... brought in for adjudication without endangering the safety of the captor or the success of his operations at the time (q); the onus of proof, as regards each of these conditions, resting on the captor, and the determination resting with the national Prize Court, subject to a right of appeal to the International Court (r). In any case, moreover, before the prize is destroyed all persons on board must be placed in safety, and all the ships papers and other relevant documents be taken on board the warship (s). All neutral goods of an innocent character which are involved in the destruction of the vessel must be paid for (t). In their practical application these rules appear to work out as follows:--(1) If the captor fails to show that the destruction was forced on him by exceptional necessity, then the owners of both vessel and cargo, even though these may prove to have been liable to condemnation, will be entitled to compensation (u). There is no definition of exceptional necessity other than the provision contained in Art. 49 (x), it having been thought better to leave the determination of this question to the discretion of the Prize Court, with the usual right of appeal. (2) Even if the captor succeeds in proving exceptional necessity, he will still be bound to make compensation, unless he can also show that the vessel would have been subject to condemnation (v). (3) In any case, the captor will have to pay compensation for any neutral goods of an innocent character that were involved in the destruction (z). These provisions were thought to provide an adequate safeguard against the reckless destruction of neutral prizes by belligerents; some Powers indeed regarding them as over stringent, and as amounting virtually to a renunciation of the right of ...
