

Ewa (The bluish-green phase Book 2)

EWA is a modern/contemporary meditative (cerebralized = having a brain) fiction, that is, a novel structured in a modern way, having a science-fiction (surrealist/futuristic/anti-utopian!?) content with elements of the stream of consciousness, and its barely noticeable plot takes place in a relative time and space (in a huge apartment equipped in a minimalist fashion, with a pool and a terrace or in the Centre and outside it) by means of exhaustive dialogues, (internal) monologues and by comments mainly in the third person, revealing a reliable, all-knowing narrator. The novel is written intertextually at several levels: narration, meditation and diary fiction. The characters are chosen of superior intellectual potential, with indicative names and related (technological) professions. They are intellectuals and we learn only some details about their lives, by the by. They are mostly dissatisfied with the world they live in because they seek perfection. Searching for a man-machine (or the other way round, a machine-man) and a new (Points-) world, they explore and very critically consider the reach of the human mind and the development of the Species. Like Sartres Antoine Roquentin in Nausea, they want to get rid of the sticky filth (gelatine), but they are faced with the imperfection of the world and man. They philosophize among each other and individually about history, politics, meta/physics, religion, love and art. There are very few things that give meaning and fulfilment to their spiritual (emotional) emptiness. They give their minds to everything; they are sharp critics, relentless and somewhat narcissoid. Confronting the brain with the computer (a man and a machine), they try to rationalize the energy expenditure, to perceive time and space, consciousness and conscience. Making the static space-time more dynamic, the author plays with the traditional (human) canons (like Roger Penrose in The Emperors New Mind). One of them (a recreational mathematician) is fascinated with geometry, whereas the other (a mechanical engineer) pursues a quality change in his life and the surrounding world. The characters are intertwined in a communicational and analytical way: his Ewa (a woman-machine-girl) and Ocean, then Bishop, Xavier, Jonathan, Horatio and Cuba a team whose intellectual potential and consideration is a continuation of the authors first novel, The Chosen One (2005). Stylistic and subject-matter features of the text are perhaps best described at the end of the novel: And all those passengers who were passing through his orbit until the end of the Species would regularly slow down and unbelievably watch his face frozen in eternity. Some people were telling others about the miracle they had seen, and a fast chain reaction was set off. His blissful face became the starter of a new cycle of the human kind. The computer world soon stopped existing and people returned to what they know best searching for answers down the exciting road of curiosity and feeding their hungry imagination. Many people are sorry that Hal did not live to see the day when the new son shone up above his Species, the day that would have given him the answer to the question whether He himself was The Chosen One, but those people who truly know how to immerse themselves into that indescribable Serenity on his blissful face, the Serenity that had changed Everything, they know that still Hal was the one to realize it first. Notwithstanding the pluralism of worlds, the heterogeneity of the streams of sub/consciousness, this book still has a soul, and even logic, although everything seems illogical from the perspective of the temporal perception of life and (possible) parallel worlds. The text is challenging in its content, sets of ideas, structure and indicative graphic solutions; it requires a patient, curious and critic-inclined reader-observer.
